The use of Messrs. Scott & Co's warehouse and the services of the musicians will be given free. Ladies are asked to kindly bring refreshments. In this manner a fairly good sum of money should be raised for the purchase of instruments.

Keep the date in mind, - Friday, June 11th. Gentlemen $1. A ten piece orchestra will furnish music.

Tennis Notes

The singles tournament which has been delayed by wet weather, will be brought to a conclusion by Saturday, it is thought.

"Doc" has been distinguishing himself on the courts. By winning two sets in which his opponents had secured a handy lead he finds himself in the semi-finals.

Tuff luck, Mac! I think it hit a bump.

The finish of the tournament promises to be very interesting, and the next few games should attract a number of spectators to the court.

Of course the number of good players already out of the game is really astonishing.

There's..... But no, we will not mention their names.

Tonight's games will not be played on account of rain.

The Barbarism of Warfare

Torpedoing the Lusitania was of course, the act of barbarians. It blows aside the nebulous veil of all our humanitarian compacts and conventions, and shows in bold relief the unchanging face of war, with the features of a savage.

With the carefully planned sinking of a passenger ship carrying two thousand non-combatants—including neutrals, women and children—we return to the culture of Attila. If the Kaiser's government had wished to impress on the neutral world that war is inevitably a negation of civilization, it could hardly have chosen a fitter means. What war will do to the mind of a nation that has been trained to think war is shown by the applause with which the feat was greeted in Germany.

This country's stubborn refusal to think war, has long been the subject of more or less derisive comment on the Continent; but we are glad to believe that if an American submarine, under the same circumstances, had deliberately sent women and children to death the act would have been regarded with indignation here.

We do not mean by that to boast any inherent superiority over the people of Germany. We mean to say that our fortunate geographical position has enabled us to free ourselves sooner from the cult of Moloch. The heavy hearted restraint with which news of the killing of Americans was taken here shows that we are not willing to fight until we have exhausted every honorable means to avoid war.

That is our inestimable advantage. That deep reaction from the bloody and heathen barbarism of war is the finest prize of our culture and our highest justification. We should be truly carefully not to lose it.

Of course no one who talks about vengeance speaks for the United States. The crime avenges itself. There may be new statues in Victory Alley, at Berlin, but they will not assure the drowned women and children. Long after the war is over, the sinking of the Lusitania will shame Germany.—S.E.P.

The German government has prohibited housewives from making any more pastry until after the war is over, due to the fact that the supply of flour is not enough to warrant anything but the most limited supply of bread.

The Sorehead Press

At the time the war clouds were breaking so rapidly over Europe during the first few days of August, "Kitchener" was on everybody's lips. England wanted the strongest man she could find to fill the office of Secretary of State for War and "K of K" was the popular choice.

Conspicuous was expressed on all sides when it was announced that Kitchener was leaving for Egypt and the war portfolio had been offered to Lord Haldane. Concomitant with these announcements, bitter attacks were made by various newspapers on Lord Haldane. These attacks resulted in Kitchener's recall and appointment as Secretary of State for War, with the distinct understanding that he should have a free hand.

This was what England needed at the time—a free hand for Lord Kitchener. He was three men in one. He was an one-stroke a million hands of red tape. He looked at his inadequate military force and out of the wasteland at hand—part volunteers, part territorials and part regulars—he manufactured an expeditionary force of 125,000 men, and put it across into Belgium before the public realized that a British soldier was on the continent. That was one of the greatest feats ever performed. It saved Paris, because it delayed the advance of the Germans and enabled the French to operate further to the east, delaying other invading armies more.

England had been taken by surprise by the war, and only a man of Lord Kitchener's organizing ability could have coped with the situation. From the moment he took hold a steady stream of troops began to move from England across the Channel, and from all points in the Empire towards England. An army had to be created. It had to be trained, clothed, transported, armed, fed and outfitted. Every branch of the service had to be built from the ground up. But above all, every move had to be concealed from the enemy and this was a tremendous task when one considers that England was, and is still, overrun with German spies.

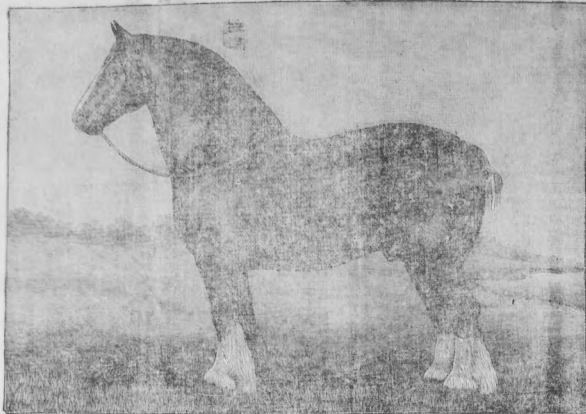

It was on this point that Lord Kitchener incurred the enmity of the newspapers that drove Lord Haldane out to make room for him, just as they are now trying to drive Lord Kitchener out to make room for someone else.

These newspapers wanted special privileges. They, above all things, wanted to have their correspondents at the front. Lord Kitchener put down his foot.

"Berlin has ten thousand spies who are waiting for your reports of our movements," he said. "Do you suppose I am going to allow any English newspaper to spread the news that Wilhelmstrasse will give tens of millions of marks to possess? No! This is war, not journalism." From that time Lord Kitchener has been marked for slaughter and for nearly the entire time he has been in office the newspapers whose correspondents he rejected have been hammering away.

You will notice that while the papers on the other side "yay" and "squeal" over Lord Kitchener, the Secretary for War never says a word. He is the Dr. Rabbitt of English statesmanship.

"The spring cleaning, which the town has just undergone should not be forgotten, but every effort should be made to keep the town clean, not for a week or a month, but all the year round."

Plum Crazy!

Under the above heading the Aberdeen Daily News (South Dakota) publishes the following anonymous communication:—
Aberdeen, May 8.—Editor News: Your editorial, "Murder, not War," shows that you are crazy.

Who is really the murderer in this war? It is England, and a thousand times England! And you with your English heart support her in murdering German children and women. But that don't hurt you, because you have no conscience. But let me tell you, it serves England right, the lesson Germany gave her in sinking the Lusitania. And let me tell you furthermore, if you don't stop this instigation of the U.S. people against Germany you will soon see the result, because you and your (good?) paper may blow up to the air or hell and shake hands with your English friends. And don't you think you can drive the U. S. people into war. We send you and your (noble?) English men in the first line for gunpowder, and furthermore you will see a revolution of the betrayed German raise in this country you have never seen before. We are tired to read your instigation editorials against Germany. America first, any time, but not you and England. England was a murderer from history till to-day, and yet supporting it. Now learn a lesson before it may be too late for you and some of your English friends.
—A friend of the People.

Ordinarily, a newspaper pays no attention to anonymous communications. A communication, to secure insertion in the columns of a newspaper must be accompanied by the name of the writer, "not necessarily for publication, but as an evidence of good faith." In the case of the anonymous letter received to-day, however, signed only "A friend of the People," the News, (Aberdeen) feels justified in publishing the communication, even though the name of the writer was omitted—for, in this instance, the "good faith" of the writer of the communication is self-evident.

With the assistance of a Big Ben one of our young men appeared at the depot on Monday morning to meet the west bound train. After the train arrived he was observed leaving the depot with gloomy mein. Throughout the day, his usual cheerfulness seemed to desert him, but requisitioning Big Ben again, he once again visited the depot at train time, since when he has beamed upon us with a smiling countenance.
